This report presents activities and figures reported to AGAMA Charity for 2025. Before public release, the Board or authorised leadership should verify supporting records, approve the narrative and reconcile the financial summary. The financial information shown is not an audited statement.

A message about the year

Every lasting change begins with a practical act of care: helping a child stay in school, making a long journey to class more manageable, planting a tree and returning to care for it, or helping a community access a small source of clean energy. Across 2025, AGAMA Charity's reported work reflected this belief—that community-led support can respond to immediate needs while opening pathways to longer-term opportunity.

Our work brings education, environmental responsibility, community wellbeing and opportunity for vulnerable children and young people into one shared purpose. We recognise that meaningful impact is not measured by activity counts alone. It is also measured by whether support reaches the people it is intended for, whether it is safe and appropriate, and whether the benefits can continue after a project activity ends.

This report is both a record of reported activities and a commitment to greater transparency. We aim to share what was done, explain how resources were used, recognise community participation and be open about the records that still require confirmation. Public trust grows when organisations celebrate progress honestly and take responsibility for improving how they document it.

Education: widening the path to opportunity

For a child, school can be a place to discover talents, form friendships and imagine a different future. But the cost of fees, uniforms, learning materials, transport and boarding can create obstacles that are difficult for families to overcome alone. AGAMA Charity's reported 2025 support included 90 vulnerable children sponsored for education, 35 bicycles donated to help with school journeys, and support for 15 boarding students.

The year also included support connected with seven Mweka graduates. Together, these reported activities reflect an approach that recognises education as a pathway—from access and attendance to training and future opportunity.

The next step is to document outcomes as carefully as inputs. Attendance and retention records, school feedback, completion data and consent-based stories can help show whether the support made a difference over time. Any public case study should protect children's privacy and be shared only with appropriate consent and safeguarding review.

Community wellbeing: practical support where it is needed

In 2025, AGAMA Charity reported donating 800 chickens to Shalom Orphanage, with the support described as benefiting 200 children. This was a practical contribution to an institution caring for children. To communicate the full value of this work, future reporting should record the purpose of the donation, how the chickens were distributed or used, and any follow-up information available from the receiving institution.

Community-led development is strongest when the people receiving support have a voice in how it is used. AGAMA Charity's ongoing commitment is to work with local partners, listen to community priorities and document both the resources delivered and the results that follow.

Environmental responsibility: planting, restoring, learning

A tree is a beginning, not the end of a restoration effort. AGAMA Charity reported planting 700 trees in Rhotia during 2025. The organisation also reported recycling 500 kilograms of waste. These activities point to a commitment to care for the places where communities live.

The long-term value of tree planting depends on locally suitable species, appropriate sites, watering, protection and survival monitoring. Likewise, waste recycling has the greatest value when materials are handled safely and there is a clear account of where they go. Future monitoring can strengthen the story by reporting tree survival rates, community participation and the destination of recycled materials.

Energy access: small systems, everyday possibilities

AGAMA Charity reported providing 100 small solar systems in a Maasai village. Access to reliable lighting can support household routines, learning after daylight hours and everyday community activities. The value of this work depends on whether the systems remain functional and suit the needs of the households receiving them.

Follow-up checks, simple user guidance and records of maintenance or repairs can help assess how well the systems continue to serve the community. Working with local people before and after distribution also helps ensure that support is appropriate, usable and sustainable.

Financial stewardship and transparency

AGAMA Charity recognises that donors and community members deserve a clear account of how resources are managed. The financial figures available for this draft indicate reported 2025 spending of US$50,000. The following category allocations were reported: education fees, 50%; torches, 20%; solar lighting, 10%; and village film or education events, 2%. These allocations total 82%, leaving 18%—US$9,000—unreconciled in the information currently available.

For that reason, this report does not present the category figures as a complete or audited financial statement. Before publication as a final annual report, AGAMA Charity should reconcile the outstanding US$9,000 against the cashbook, bank records, receipts, payment vouchers and any other supporting documentation. The organisation should also confirm whether the category percentages refer to actual expenditure, allocated budgets or another reporting basis.

Our accountability commitments

Document the evidence. Maintain invoices, receipts, payment approvals, bank reconciliations, procurement records and records confirming goods or services were received.

Protect people’s dignity. Keep beneficiary information confidential and use personal stories or photographs only with appropriate informed consent and safeguarding review.

Report outcomes, not only activities. Where possible, follow up on school attendance, bicycle use and safety, tree survival, solar-system functionality and the outcomes of community support.

Correct the record when needed. Where records are incomplete, disclose the limitation, reconcile the figures and update the public report rather than presenting uncertain information as verified.

Governance, safeguarding and the way forward

AGAMA Charity is a community-based organisation established in 2011 and registered in Tanzania under registration number CBO/KRT/3587, according to the organisation's supplied details. The organisation's public-facing work should be guided by responsible oversight, financial accountability, safeguarding, respectful partnerships and a clear focus on community benefit.

Strong governance is more than a policy on paper. It means that decisions are documented, responsibilities are understood, risks are reviewed, resources are used for their intended purpose and concerns can be raised safely. AGAMA Charity's Board and leadership should review this report, verify the activity figures and approve the final version before it is represented as the organisation's official 2025 account.

Safeguarding is central to work involving children and young people. Activities should be planned to protect participants from harm, respect privacy, provide appropriate referral routes and ensure that assistance is delivered without exploitation or discrimination. Public communications should never compromise the safety or dignity of the people the organisation serves.

Looking ahead

The activities reported for 2025 offer a foundation for continued learning and stronger documentation. Priorities for the next reporting period include sustaining education support, checking the condition and use of distributed bicycles and solar systems, monitoring the survival of planted trees, strengthening community partnerships, and improving financial reporting and evidence of outcomes.

AGAMA Charity also aims to make its public reporting more useful to donors and communities by clearly separating planned activities from completed work, reporting actual expenditure against approved budgets, and explaining both achievements and challenges. This discipline helps build the confidence needed for long-term partnerships.

Acknowledgements

AGAMA Charity acknowledges the community members, caregivers, schools, local partners, supporters and donors whose participation makes community-rooted work possible. Their time, trust and collaboration are essential to turning resources into opportunities. We also recognise that every reported number represents people, households and communities whose dignity must remain at the centre of the work.

A final reflection

The story of AGAMA Charity is a story of practical care: a child supported to learn, a journey made more manageable, a tree given the chance to grow, a household gaining access to light, and a community receiving support that responds to a real need. The work is not finished when a donation is made or an activity is completed. Its deeper value lies in what changes afterwards—and in our willingness to measure, learn and remain accountable.
